Weeks of rain combined with the melting snow of spring brought about a small disaster in Springfield last weekend. The Black River had been rising all week. Because of this warning, most Springfield residents were able to flee the area before the flood occurred.

Around midnight, a muffled sound was heard as water from the river rushed swiftly through the streets of Springfield's shopping district. The water rose to half a meter in some places.

An abandoned warehouse near the train station collapsed from the force of the rushing water. A water storage tank was also wrecked by the flood. Fortunately, no other major damage was reported. Early Saturday morning, several groups of children were seen floating rafts down the water-filled streets. By late afternoon, however, the water level had dropped to a few centimeters, and by Sunday morning it was gone.
